Q- Are Driving Records considered public records for anyone to see?

A- No, they are not public records. That means you must have a 'permissible purpose' to request driving records and some states may require proof of this with a signed release. Each state establishes their own laws concerning access and depth of information released. For instance, Pennsylvania now requires every end-user to be registered with the state.

Tracy ran a criminal history check on her new Admin Asst, Nancy. Months later, when the police came to arrest Nancy on a new charge, they mentioned her past criminal record, which surprised Tracy. "How could that be? Nancy told me she has only lived in Dallas, and I checked Dallas County." Tracy's mistake? She took Nancy's word that she had only lived in Dallas. Some "word"!

Do you know where your applicant has lived for the past 7 years? Are you sure?

Many times applicants will intentionally omit an address if there is something they are trying to hide. It could be a conviction, an active warrant, a pending court case – any number of things that they prefer you not find. Achievement Tec's Name/Social Trace is the answer. This report provides the applicant's public residence history for the last 7 years and longer. If they have applied for credit, rented an apartment, or registered their name and address in some way, then that address will most likely show up. Used in conjunction with your criminal history checks, you are much more likely to 'catch' those individuals who prefer not to be discovered.

We have recently lowered the price of the Name/Social Trace to just $5.00 – giving you added protection for a very low cost. Order online as you enter your applicant info, indicate on your faxed in orders, or call today and we will include it in your default request. Tracy did!
